Dishonest Candidates Caught in the Act

1 A Near Perfect Forgery caught by BackCheck

BackCheck was conducting an Education Verification on an candidate for a client who claimed to have a Bachelor of Arts. After verifying the institution and submitting the file, BackCheck received a response stating that the candidate had not only not graduated, but had only completed 15 of 90 credits. As we had the diploma on file, we wanted to verify this information (perhaps they had 2 individuals with the same name, who were in the same program). BackCheck called the school and explained the situation, and upon further investigation it was discovered that the Diploma was a forgery. The forgery was a good one – they picked up on it because a couple of the signatures at the bottom looked suspicious!

2 Uncover Degrees from Diploma Mills

An candidate claimed to have a Bachelor's Degree in Business Administration from Ashwood University. The university contact information directed BackCheck to a website that 'verified' that the candidate had graduated with a GPA of 3.78. Normally, a university will only verify education if they are provided with signed consent by the candidate; as such, BackCheck's verification team conducted additional research and it was discovered that Ashwood was a diploma mill. The client was notified, and the candidate was not offered the position.

3 Reveal the Truth about Your Candidates' Education Claims

Before offering an executive position to a candidate, BackCheck's client decided to verify his claim that he was a Certified Managerial Accountant. BackCheck contacted the university and was informed that the candidate had attended the school, but had not graduated.

When questioned, the candidate came clean: he was 4 courses short of achieving his CMA designation. He also revealed that he had held 4 positions since 'graduating', and none of his previous employers had bothered to verify his CMA status.
